Keeping Your Work Hot Over the Summer

The university's summer recess usually doesn't mean the same thing to students in graduate school as it did when they were undergrads. Instead of a vacation, grad students are likely thinking about simply shifting, rather than stopping, their academic and career progress during those months. Summer institutes are one way to capitalize on the break from classes while staying focused on your scholarship and professionalization. To learn more about summer institutes, click here.

Language, Collaboration, and, Above All, Dignity

Richmond Embeywa's educational journey has taken him around the globe -- from Kenya to Germany to the United States -- as he pursues his research and participation in language pedagogy, particularly in regard to language learning in refugee communities. Now, as Embeywa works toward a PhD in Translational German studies, he again finds his studies taking on international scope. To read more about Embeywa and his work, click here.

Go for the Grand Prize at Grad Slam

Your work is worth $1,000 a minute -- and it's time to earn it during Grad Slam, the campus-wide competition for the best 3-minute presentation by a graduate student on their research or creative project. Students in all disciplines are encouraged to participate and compete for the $3,000 grand prize! It's an excellent opportunity for students to enhance their communication skills, particularly when it comes to conveying their specialized work to a mixed audience. Thinking about Grad Slam but worried about the presentation aspect? Read on for resources on public speaking!
